Peek Inside the Book

It was the time of year, the time of day, for a small insistent sadness to pass into the texture of things. Dusk, silence, iron chill. Something lonely in the bone....

Some people are larger than life. Hitler is larger than death. Don DeLillo, White Noise

Reader's Opinions

After getting through this book for a third time, I'm still blown away by it. Although the social satire becomes more obvious on multiple readings, there are more than enough mind-blowing moments to make it worthwhile. I still have a few questions. What does Wilder crying at the end mean? Is that him finally speaking? Or is it some semblance...

This is probably the most accessible of DeLillo's works, the one which I could pull off my shelf, dust off its weathered skin, and hand to you, saying, "This is what the master does best." Or something a little less...
